Cultivating Productivity through Regulation: The Case of Pesticide Bans in France
[Latest version]

Economists have long debated the impact of regulation on productivity. Identifying this impact is challenging because many confounding factors typically affect a firm's production function.

This paper examines it in a setting with a simple production function: French crop farming. Specifically, I study how increasingly restrictive pesticide bans have affected farm productivity and agrochemical innovation. To this end, I combine French farm-level balance sheets and crop protection records with the registry of pesticide authorizations. I find that bans on inputs without substitutes are the most costly for farms, but also induce the most innovation, including entirely new active molecules. Regulation therefore involves a trade-off between short-term productivity losses and medium-term technological progress.
